Contributions to Science

Vestibular Influences on Cardiovascular Regulation

Since 1990, NIH has funded our studies of the influences of the vestibular system on cardiovascular regulation. At the time we initiated these studies, there was rudimentary evidence that inputs from the vestibular system affect sympathetic nervous system activity, but our work was key in defining the physiological role of the vestibular system in regulating blood distribution in the body during movement and changes in posture. We also determined the neural pathways through which vestibulo-sympathetic interactions occur. Currently, we are ascertaining the effects of planning of movement on reflexes that participate in cardiovascular control. Our work has been a springboard for studies by a number of investigators, who have demonstrated the physiological importance of vestibulo-cardiovascular influences in a variety of species, including humans.

Neurobiology of Motion Sickness

Another theme of our work since 1993 is the neurobiology of motion sickness. We are one of the few laboratories that utilized modern neuroanatomical techniques and single unit recordings to define the neural circuitry that generates nausea and vomiting. As part of this work, we employed transneuronal tracing techniques soon after their inception to determine the pathways that elicit the co-contraction of respiratory muscles that result in emesis. By making use of a novel statistical approach for analyzing Fos labeling patterns, we also defined the networks of neurons that are activated during motion sickness. Other experiments focused on the integration of emetic signals by brainstem neurons that participate in generating nausea and vomiting.

Multisensory Integration of Signals by the Vestibular System

My third long-standing research theme is multisensory integration by the vestibular system. We have demonstrated that somatosensory and visceral signals from all body regions shape the responses of vestibular nucleus and cerebellar neurons to labyrinthine inputs. As part of this work, we also demonstrated that nonlabyrinthine inputs can substitute for lost vestibular signals following a bilateral labyrinthectomy. Although a number of laboratories have investigated neck afferent influences on the processing of vestibular signals, few other than ours have considered effects of sensory inputs from other body regions on the activity of vestibulospinal pathways.

Research Ethics

A fourth contribution to science has been in the arena of research ethics. I have contributed a number of lectures and manuscripts to the topic, particularly in relation to balancing regulatory burden with regulatory compliance. Another interest has been improving strategies that regulatory offices can employ to maintain good relationships with investigators. These strategies were formulated while I served as Chair of the University of Pittsburgh's IACUC and Co-Director of the University's Research Conduct and Compliance Office. A more recent interest is publication ethics, which emerged from my role as Editor-in-Chief of the Journal of Neurophysiology and Experimental Brain Research.
